It is charged that they went to the wholesale warehouse of Julius Weil, Son & Co. at 62 Ninth Avenue and presented a permit for the purchase and removal of 200 cases of whisky valued at $15,000. Weil's employees kept the men in the place and communicated with the authorities, who declared the permit a forgery.

The two men told Robert Beattie, Assistant United States Attorney, that a man hired them to take the permit to Weil and promised to pay them well if the permit was honored. Levine's bail was later reduced to the chouse of the Messing calamity more strongly than any other earthquake disaster since. One row of buildings was observed apparently intact.

Immediately preceding the assault, which, Fisher alleges, the agent had spened the conversation by telling Marren to drive to prohibition headquarters. The driver demanded to be shown Fisher's credentials. Fisher did not have them with him.

Fisher says that after he was knocked off the truck he ran after it and caught it. This attracted some attention, and Fisher says ten or more men came from a nearby saloon and attacked him.

Fisher was rescued by Patrolmen Hickman and Smith, and Marren was taken to United States Commissioner Held him in $1,000 bail, charged with interfering
